TAIPEI, Taiwan — Chen Shui-bian, vilified by China as radical who would thrust Taiwan toward independence and war, won Taiwan's presidential election Saturday, trouncing the candidate of the party that has ruled this island for more than half a century.

Beijing deeply distrusts Chen because his Democratic Progressive Party favors taking Taiwan from de-facto to formal independence and making the 51-year-old split with China permanent.

But the president-elect, who has softened his stance on independence to appeal to nervous voters, immediately pledged to seek dialogue with Beijing.

China's first response to Chen's win was that it would wait to see how he would handle relations. The election results "will not change the status of Taiwan as a part of China," the government said in a statement issued by state media.

China has repeatedly threatened to wage war to block formal independence by Taiwan, which it has considered a renegade

WORLD BRIEFS Hundreds die in cult church fire

From Wire Reports

KAMPALA, Uganda — At least 235 followers of a doomsday cult burned to death in a church fire in a remote part of southwestern Uganda, authorities said Saturday.

It was unclear whether sect leader Joseph Kibweteere died in the fire in the small trading center of Kanungu, 217 miles from Uganda's capital, Kampala, and near the Congolese border. He had predicted the world would end Dec. 31 but changed it to Dec. 31, 2000.
